Smoke Alarm Paintings

Ionisation smoke alarms contain a small quantity of radioactive material. The material ionises the air inside a metal chamber, generating a constant electrical current. When smoke enters the chamber, the current is interrupted and the alarm sounds.

These are paintings, first of all.

Paintings for a room at risk of burning (which is all rooms).

Paintings hung in anticipation of a future event (which may be right now).

The event resembles a diagram or a decoration or some terrible fate.

It drifts between symptom, image and signal without settling into any one of them.
